Outcomes of lumbar fusion for degenerative disease with and without lumbar scoliosis. Prospective data (N = 217) on the outcomes of patients undergoing posterior interbody fusion were collected from two university-based spine centers. Pre- and postoperative severity of radiographic instability and spondylolisthesis was assessed using the modified American Association of Neurological Surgeons scale and the Ludloff method, respectively. Disease severity, patient-reported outcomes, and complications were also measured. Patients were followed for an average of 4.5 years. Scoliosis was present in 116 cases (53%), and the average degree of spondylolisthesis was 35%. Analysis of patients with and without scoliosis demonstrated no differences in baseline radiographic severity (P >.05), significant improvements in back and leg pain (P

Gameplay video GamasutraPlaythrough Arcade, the only video game you need the internet to play Go to ArcadeGo to ArcadePlay Atari GamesQ: How to unit test a Razor server helper I have this server helper that returns a partial view of a model. My question is, I would like to unit test this and use some of the mock data. But I don't know how to instantiate and pass to the helper and get back the view result. `_Model.cs: public class Model { public Model() { var innerModel = new InnerModel(); // do some things var results = _ServerHelper.Run(innerModel); } }` In the class for the server helper: `public class ServerHelper { public Result Run(Model model) { // do the search here } }` So the problem is I don't know how to instantiate the model and pass it in so that I can get back the view results. A: You can mock it by using `NSubstitute` or `Moq`, but in this case it seems the server helper is acting as a controller so I would recommend using a unit of work and the `ActionResult` object to return the View. That way the model is not necessary and the result can be verified. EDIT If I read your comments correctly, you want to test the `ServerHelper` method for adding a product. In this case you could refactor it as: `public class ProductViewModel { public string Name { get; set; } public ProductViewModel() { } } public class ProductController : Controller { private readonly IRepository<Product> _repository; public ProductController(IRepository<Product> repository) { _repository = repository; } public ActionResult Index() { var product = _repository.GetById(1);`

. Welcome to the fallout of eight seasons spent rooting for a team the American people wanted to slay the dragon for. Welcome to post-hope. Welcome to how it feels, suddenly, to be on the losing team. Annnnd welcome to football! Welcome to the 2014 NFL season! All is merciful in the end. Even the year Tim Tebow, the first man to finish a game against Alex Smith with his first three passes, is over. Just last week I watched a must-win against an AFC rival get shoved into an early weekend playoff date. One of the opponents in that game is gone to the Super Bowl. And a franchise quarterback now has more cap space than me. But not everything is terrifyingly beautiful. We needed to be ready to deal with things when they turn with the seasons for some reason. Now, not so much. A sensible and stable franchise turned volatile, with the lightning rod quarterback up for a pay increase and the bleeding head coach bristling with stress. Matt Moore, who won two games in his two years as the starter, was benched and replaced by an utterly random third-stringer, Josh Johnson, who promptly took Miami to an astonishing third-quarter comeback against New Orleans. Ryan Tannehill, Miami's $20 million man who is one more Peyton Manning away from GM-worthy quarterbacking, gave a dreadful performance at home against the Chargers. Ryan Tannehill, drafted in 2010 after the modern NFL was known to have produced one Peyton Manning, batted the ball around corners before throwing a pick-six as the clock wound down. Why should I ask him to lead my team? With his timid passing, his fumbling, his inability to drive the ball downfield—he was the only quarterback to start the regular season without at least 30 touchdowns—he was a third-stringer for the entire 2014 season, a petulant child ever so resigned to following a disinterested father, a sad, unhappy man who was said to be studying yoga at Dolphins training camp. Since when is Mr. Citrus kicked out of the combine the quarterback Miami can't trust for one of the most important jobs in the NFL? Suddenly, the Dolphins are desperate for some stable quarterback play to secure our future. That is, in 2010, the sensible team hired Matt Moore and began to woo that new enigmatic, 26-year-old Peyton-manning-like quarterback, all because the Broncos lost to New
